Colonial architecture is a cultural heritage that has potential to be developed in Surabaya. Handinoto (1996: 163) said, the Dutch colonial style of architecture in Indonesia after 1900 was a specific form. Arising from the development of modern Dutch architecture of the period, which adapted to wet tropical climate in Indonesia. Results of Dutch colonial architecture in Indonesia at that time have a different character with modern architecture that flourished in European countries.

In West Surabaya, there are so many abandoned old building. In connection with the rapid development of the region in the field of business and the development of modern nuances. Like the mall, shop houses, apartments, and even residential-housing

This phenomenon is a major issue that wants to be criticized by the designer. As a foundation to begin the process of designing, designers start with a focus on the issues raised. Then determine the appropriate design method for the issue. The main vision of the design is ‘criticism’. Through colonial buildings. With the purpose of recalling criticism parties should be aware, that the colonial architectural heritage is an asset that has potential to be preserved

Design process using design methods in the processing of metaphor theme. According to Geoffrey Broadbent in his book Design in Architecture, metaphor is a translator form of something. So the theme is explained to get the characteristic and translate it into application design.

Macro design concept is explained by applying the principles of colonial architecture and setting the image to fit the function of the building. It is done by providing space for visitors to enjoy the colonial architecture so that it can provide a different atmosphere from the surrounding environment. The main facade is filled by Windows and doors which are decorated with the typical colonial elements.

The design must be able to project the character of colonial architecture with an understanding of the function of each element. It is done by highlighting a comfortable dining atmosphere and typical colonial. Exterior and interior design should be able to highlight the elements of colonial detail, especially in the afternoon and evening.
